As a American citizen and father of two, I understand the importance of law enforcement agencies having the ability to monitor valid threats and gaining evidence to prosecute or intelligence to stop illegal activity.
However, I do feel the ability to monitor all internet activity is superflous and is an infringement of anyone's rights as an American citizen. A computer is a very personal artifact. (Hence the title PC)

As an IT Professional, I feel this ability will be easily abused, not only by our law enforcement agencies, but by hackers as well. I believe there is a huge possibility of this backdoor to be exploited once the groundwork is laid out.

Finally, the cost of implementing such a system will be very expensive to ISP's.
Will any of this cost be absorbed by the government.

I almost wish law enforcement would do it the old fasioned way and just sieze a suspect's computer.

Thank you for your time,

Roman Patrick Dean